In the early 1980's as a U.S. Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Weicker supported efforts to fund AIDS research and to provide health services to persons infected with the disease. Federal research and clinical trial funding resulted in the development of drugs that transformed the disease from a terminal to a chronic condition. In June 2015, the National Institutes of Health named a building in Senator Weicker's honor for his support of biomedical research in general and his crucial role in securing funding to test the experimental drug AZT and to provide it to people dying of AIDS.
